The Trump administration on Monday released a long-awaited report that recommends selling parts of the National Security Agency's controversial mass-surveillance program. The move comes after several congressional committees conducted closed-door hearings on the program, conducted by officials from the NSA and FBI, to determine how the agency acquired the data. ADVERTISEMENT New details of the surveillance programs came to light during those hearings, which opened in July and led to a bipartisan backlash against the NSA. The administration has been criticized for the "unprecedented" move of reexamining the program, after Trump initially promised to repair relations with the intelligence community. The report released Monday was authored by a six-member panel overseen by NSA's director, Adm. Michael Rogers. The panel received input from over 700 people, including both technology experts and current and former government officials. It concluded the surveillance program has been crucial to stopping terrorist attacks, while the public has little recourse to challenge the practice. The panel recommended the NSA, currently overseen by Rogers, be run by a civilian leader, and that parts of the

This helps us keep the feedback coming, so thank you! - Dave and Tom to the victim. People v Hyde, 285 Mich App 428, 431; 775 NW2d 833 (2009). The defendant challenges the trial court's finding that he did not act in self-defense by just assuming that someone had a gun or by saying the victim was the aggressor, despite his statement to that effect. On the first day of trial, the defendant testified that, when the victim punched him in the head in the backseat of the car on the night of the crime, the victim's hand had entered his pocket and had, at some point, poked or grazed him. Thus, the defendant perceived the victim's act to be an act of aggression toward him and there were circumstances that reasonably would cause a person of ordinary and reasonable prudence to fear for his safety. In short, there was evidence from which the trial court could find the defendant's testimony not to be credible. People v Miller, 481 Mich 540, 565-566; 751 NW2d 497 (2008). Furthermore, the defendant testified that he pulled out his gun because of the victim's actions. However, a person's use of a gun does not justify another person punching him in the head. People v Atkins, 645 Mich. 230, 245; 521 NW2d 648 (1994). The punch was random rather than deliberate. There was substantial evidence upon which the trial court could find that the defendant was not acting in lawful self-defense when he shot the victim. Accordingly, there was no plain error warranting relief. We affirm.
